

They Couldn't Afford Rent...

- In 2007, two broke friends in San Francisco were struggling to pay rent.
- A local conference had fully booked every hotel.
- So they got creative:
They rented out air mattresses in their living room.

No One Believed In Them

They called their idea “Airbed & Breakfast”—a simple way to rent out an air mattress in their apartment to travelers who couldn’t find a hotel.

But when they pitched it to investors, the response was cold.

One after another, they heard the same thing: “No one’s going to let strangers sleep in their home.” They approached seven investors, and seven turned them down.

With hardly any money left, and no support from the startup world, it felt like the end.

But instead of quitting... They took a sharp turn—and got even more creative.

They Sold Cereal To Survive

- To survive, they sold cereal during the 2008 elections.
- Raised $30,000.
- That hustle got them into Y Combinator.
- And then... things took off

From a tiny apartment filled with doubt...
To leading a global movement across 220+
countries.

These three dreamers didn't have funding, didn't have support –
just a problem they were desperate to solve.

Today, they are the faces behind one of the world's biggest travel revolutions.

This is Airbnb

Founded by:

Nathan Blecharczyk

Brian Chesky

Joe Gebbia